Cvid19 regulations March 20, 2020, leading to exceptional city quietness: Friday early evening in Covent Garden, London, Photo: A.T.

Since our 2020/B cover editorial was photographed in October 2019 and drafted the following month, cities across the world are experiencing a severe economic reboot due to Coronavirus (COVID-19), coupled with a significant number of fatalities; at the publication date of our 2020/B magazine, there is still no clear-cut research that pinpoints the lifecycle of this pandemic. For updated information, consult the <https://www.who.int> webpage of the World Health Organization. The role of government in supporting the community may be more important now than ever, and government responses to the outbreak have varied from country to country.

One thing is clear: If we love our cities, we must also love the small businesses that contribute enormously to their vibrant cultures. Cities cannot be shut down and brought to a stand-still indefinitely, and then expected to simply switch back on and function as normal. Small businesses must have a continuous flow of revenue to be able to cover rents, salaries and other expenses. These issues must be considered alongside health and hygiene, to ensure that societies can rebuild after the pandemic has passed.

Furthermore, we must take care of the environment rather than breaking down nature through pollution and deforestation.

What matters most is that life, in all of its diversity, is cared for gracefully. That, too, must be thought of as a part of fashion and elegance within our communities.

In our 2020/C issue, arriving September 15th, 2020, we will have some follow-up about such themes in some of our articles. Even if possibly the COVID-19 is not a pandemic by mid-September, the cities will be different than before, and much will be in need of rebuilding. Our strongest wishes of health and prosperity to everyone in this phase.
